in the bell curve herrnstein and murray demonstrate that a mother s score on the armed forces qualification test is a powerful predictor of her child s score on a cognitive achievement test we replicate this finding however even after controlling for maternal scores there are significant gaps in the scores of black and white children which suggests that maternal scores are not all that matter in fact both maternal education and income are important determinants of child test scores conditional on maternal afqt we argue that racial gaps in test scores matter because even within families children with higher scores are less likely to repeat grades however conditional on both child test scores and maternal afqt maternal education and income also affect a child s probability of grade repetition we conclude that even if one accepts test scores as valid measures of nature both nature and nurture matter finally we show that the effects on child test scores of maternal test scores education and income differ dramatically depending on the nature of the test the age of the child and race the results suggest that understanding the relationships between different aspects of maternal achievement and child outcomes may help us unravel the complex process through which poverty is transmitted across generations
